Introduction:

The European Commission's Directorate General for Research (DG RTD) is engaged in an extensive range of activities to actively strengthen the culture of science communication in Europe. DG RTD is striving to create an environment which promotes the dissemination of results of scientific research through the mass media and to increase public awareness of the impact of science on our daily lives.

Within this context, DG RTD is organising the first European Forum on Science Journalism which will take place in Barcelona on 3-4 December 2007. The conference will bring together science journalists from across Europe to discuss the evolution in reporting scientific news, efforts to secure greater prominence for science in the media and the impact of new media tools on the profession.

To contribute to the discussion on science journalism in the EU, Ogilvy Public Relations Worldwide (OPR) has been commissioned by DG RTD to conduct an overview of science coverage in the written European press. The objective is to identify and better understand the actors involved in reporting science and their approach to science coverage.

This report provides a comprehensive media landscape, identifying the national press agencies, national newspapers, specialised print science publications and online science publications in the 27 EU Member States. It also includes an overview of the approach of national newspapers to covering science stories, identifying the regularity of science articles, columns, features and supplements.

The methodology used in collating this data was twofold. Extensive desk research was conducted using tools such as MediaAtlas, internet search engines and the publications themselves. All information concerning the approach of national newspapers to science coverage was gathered through one-to-one contact with each national newspaper in the 27 EU Member States. The interviews, telephone contacts and written correspondence also served to confirm the results of the desk research.

The study reveals considerable differences in the approach to reporting science both among and within EU Member States. A majority of national newspapers do not have fixed / regular science sections and treat science as any other news topic, typically published under a general News or Society section of the paper. However, a significant number of publications do have regular science sections which are scheduled to run on fixed days and at set intervals.

While several publications expressed their intention to establish fixed science sections over the coming months, others reported recently dropping dedicated science sections in favour of including science among general news stories. Nevertheless a prevailing feature across the board is that health and the environment are topics of increasing importance and public interest, both of which are closely linked to developments in scientific research. Publications which do not directly cover science, frequently do so in this context.

OPR believes that the information herein provides a solid basis to further expand the activities of the European Commission in promoting science and the results of scientific research. It is a practical manual to facilitate media relations and extend the scope of current communication activities.

To facilitate the use of this reference document, the report is divided per country with publications listed in alphabetical order. Circulation data was collated from national circulation audit bureaux, MediaAtlas and the publications own material and is referenced throughout the document.

Although this document contains the most up-to-date data at the time of publishing, it should be noted that the media landscape of each Member State is a constantly evolving environment. The information herein is therefore subject to continuous change. We therefore welcome any feedback which would enable us to maintain this document.
